

The College of Law welcomes new Family Law lecturer

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Sydney, 15 March 2010

The College of Law NSW has welcomed Danielle Jaku-Greenfield to its academic ranks, with the experienced practitioner having commenced the role as a Family Law lecturer in the Master of Applied Law (Family Law) Program this month.

Prior to joining The College of Law, Ms Jaku-Greenfield worked as a family law solicitor, as well as a Registered Family Dispute Resolution Practitioner in private practice. She was the co-founder of the Sydney Mediation Partnership, where she continues to specialise in family dispute resolution.

As a former student of The College of Law, Ms Jaku-Greenfield is looking forward to returning to lecture in a subject she is passionate about.

“The social-work aspect definitely inspired me to become involved in this area of law,” said Ms Jaku-Greenfield. “Although it’s cliché, I like to help people and in family law you have the opportunity to help people in miserable situations. Learning about my rights whilst studying family law at university also made me feel empowered as a woman and I felt I could empower other women if I went on to practise family law.”

“This course is particularly relevant for Australian practitioners as it is a very practical and relevant Masters program which allows practitioners to look closely at the laws, changes in legislation and the application of the law that practitioners don’t have the opportunity to do while they are busy practising,” she continued.

Ms Jaku-Greenfield hopes that the program will allow students to develop strengths in areas they may not have previously felt confident in, as well as encouraging them to think critically about the way they practise.

Dr John Nelson, Director, Applied Law Programs, The College of Law, New South Wales, is excited to welcome another experienced lecturer to Applied Law Program..
